

AN ANALYTICAL APPROACH TO HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS IN EGYPT
FROM THE START OF THE REVOLUTION TO PRESENT DAY

Susana S. Bickel and Matea Gelic (Edward Curtis), Department of International Studies, IU School of Liberal Arts, Indiana University–Purdue University Indianapolis, Indianapolis, Indiana 46202

There are so many current issues that are in violation of Human Rights around the world and the purpose of my research is to address the ones being violated specifically in Egypt from the beginning of the protests to what is currently taking place. Not only will we attempt to find out the numerous human violations in Egypt, but also try to explain why action was not taken and what should have been done instead. Egypt is one of the countries in the Middle-East that has had the most progression through the Arab Spring, but whether the outcome is good or not is still too early to tell. We hope to begin our research with the examination and better understanding of the country's internal politics and its treatment of human rights throughout history. We plan to utilize a multitude of sources such as international law documents, domestic and foreign articles from the time period of the revolution, interviews with participants of the revolution and experts on Egypt, and multimedia sources including Facebook and Twitter. With this research, our goal is to achieve a better understanding of the human rights situation during the Egyptian revolution and its impact on the country's progress.